

Should non-Indigenous Australians have a relationship with Country?

National Press Club

16 National Circuit,
Barton ACT 2600

5.30 - 7pm
Wednesday, 13th June

Light refreshments
from 7 - 8pm

Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Peoples' connections with Country extend tens of thousands of years, and to the Dreamtime itself. Differences in how Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Peoples and settlers viewed the living Australian landscape were a chief source of misunderstandings and conflict between the two groups. Non-Indigenous appropriation of the land challenged and continues to challenge Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples' relationships with Country.

This panel discussion brings together diverse views to answer a range of questions, including:

The Panellists

Professor Tom Calma, is Co-chair of Reconciliation Australia and Chancellor of the University of Canberra

Professor Kerry Arabena is Chair for Indigenous Health and Director of the Indigenous Health Equity Unit at The University of Melbourne

Facilitated by Michael Moore AM and Summer May Finlay

- Should non-Indigenous Australians have a relationship with Country?
- What form might non-Indigenous relationships with Country take, and how would non-Indigenous spiritual and intellectual traditions be likely to shape them?
- Who should or could authorise such relationships?
- Could Indigenous and non-Indigenous relationships with Country work together to improve ecological sustainability in Australia?
- What are the global environmental implications of Indigenous and non-Indigenous relationships with Country?

Sponsored by the
Frank Fenner Foundation

UNIVERSITY OF CANBERRA

Collaborative Indigenous Research Initiative (UC CIRI)